

Where Should a City Plant Its Next Ten Thousand Trees?

A standfirst goes here — two or three lines that set up the argument and give the reader a reason to stay. Replace this text with your own opening, keeping it to roughly forty words.

WORDS BY [AUTHOR NAME] · PHOTOGRAPHS BY [PHOTOGRAPHER]

Caption: describe what this photograph shows and where it was taken. Photograph credit.

Open with your strongest paragraph. This template is set in two justified columns with a drop cap — the classic arrangement for a feature, and comfortable to read at this measure. Replace every line with your own copy.

Keep paragraphs short enough to breathe. A column this width carries about forty characters a line.

A pull quote sits here — one sentence, chosen because it carries the argument on its own.

NAME, ROLE, ORGANISATION

Continue after the quote. Need more room? Shorten the standfirst or the hero photograph — the grid holds.

Text flows from the foot of this column into the top of the next, so a long paragraph here simply pushes the images along. The pair of frames below breaks to whichever column has room for both.

Caption. Credit.

Caption. Credit.

Close here, or run on to a second page. Type, rules, frames and colour are all on the Green Vision palette, so edits stay on brand.

Two columns of placeholder run to the foot of the page so the template reads as a finished spread rather than a sketch. Delete what you do not need — the stat strip and the footer stay pinned to the bottom margin whatever you do above them.

If a piece needs more room than one sheet, duplicate the page in Canva and delete the masthead on the second: the grid, the column measure and the margins all carry over unchanged.

2.6M

MAPPED FEATURES

5

CITIES BAKED IN

<1s

PER MAP READ